

Overview of Data

Ghana outperforms its neighbors and most African countries in terms of political stability and political and civil liberties. However, it still scores below global averages on corruption and transparency indicators, suggesting moderate to high corruption risks. Four FCPA cases connected to alleged corruption in Ghana reflects an elevated degree of enforcement in relation to the size of Ghana's economy.

Illustrative FCPA Cases (as reported)

Total FCPA Enforcement: 4 Cases

- Analogic—In 2016 the medical device producer agreed to pay more than USD 11 million to settle charges that its subsidiary BK medical had engaged in a pattern of suspicious payments in several countries, including Ghana. BK medical allegedly allowed itself to be used as a slush fund for its distributors, permitting the redistribution of money without proper accounting and controls.
- Kinross Gold—In 2018 the Canadian gold mining company paid nearly USD 1 million to settle an SEC complaint that it had insufficient due diligence procedures and controls in place to prevent the payment of bribes to government officials. The company reportedly assessed that its acquisitions in Ghana and Mauritania—mining companies Tasiast and Chirano—had insufficient ABC controls. It was cited for allegedly failing to adequately remedy this despite continuing to engage in high-risk transactions.

Country Comparison

Context: Corruption in Angola

While legislation is on the books in Ghana criminalizing both active and passive bribery, numerous opportunities for corruption persist due to poor transparency rules for public officials coupled with economic and political incentives for rent seeking. Engagements involving public officials in Ghana should be approached with elevated caution. As with many resource exporting countries, corruption is a risk within extractive industries in Ghana, although there has only been one FCPA case related to mining and no oil & gas industry cases. Ghana also scores well on NRG's Resource Governance Index and is rated the best in Africa for governance of its oil & gas industry.
