

Overview of Data

Its recent high-profile corruption scandals notwithstanding, Malaysia outperforms most of ASEAN and performs near the global average on many governance indicators. Recent high-level corruption issues and subsequent anticorruption efforts appear to have improved its performance in key governance indicators. With five cases, Malaysia has been the focus of a moderate amount of FCPA enforcement in relation to the size of its economy. There is no discernible sectoral pattern in the distribution of cases.

Illustrative FCPA Cases (as reported)

Total FCPA Enforcement: 5 Cases

- Goldman Sachs—This ongoing case relates to the 1 Malaysian Development Berhad (1MDB) scandal involving a government fund from which billions of dollars were allegedly misappropriated. US regulators have brought charges against three individuals associated with Goldman Sachs for alleged FCPA or money laundering violations. Goldman Sachs executed three bond offerings for 1MDB and its three employees allegedly bribed Malaysian government officials to further a massive embezzlement scheme.
- Tyco—In a 2012 Settlement, Tyco paid nearly USD 27 million to resolve charges that its subsidiaries in numerous countries and sectors—including Tyco Fire, Security & Services Malaysia SDN BHD—had engaged in numerous bribery schemes between 2006 and 2009.
- Alcatel—The telecom company allegedly used local subsidiaries as part of a concerted global strategy to bribe officials to obtain or retain contracts. Consultants engaged by these subsidiaries allegedly distributed more than USD 8 million in unaccounted funds to officials in Malaysia and other countries.

Context: Corruption in Malaysia

Despite its relatively high marks for governance—Malaysia has the lowest rate of bribery in ASEAN aside from Singapore according to Transparency International—corruption is a high-profile political and social issue in the country today. Scandals involving the misappropriation of huge amounts of public money have been making headlines for the last few years, including the ongoing 1MDB scandal and the 2018 arrest of former Prime Minister Najib Razak for corruption and embezzlement charges. Consequently, it is not surprising that TI also notes that among ASEAN members, Malaysians are the most critical of their government’s handling of corruption issues.
